New animal transport laws set to come in across the country from July 1 will be have widespread implications for all sectors of the livestock industries.

The draft legislation will hold responsible, all parties involved in the sale and movement of livestock, including farmers, saleyards and abattoirs.

Philip Halton, Executive Director of the Australian Livestock Transporters Association, has told Lisa Herbert the new animal welfare and transport laws won't just apply to the owner and operator of the vehicle.

There are new animal transport laws set to come in across the country from July 1 that will have widespread implications for all sectors of the livestock industries.

Four years in the making, the draft legislation will hold responsible all parties involved in the sale and movement of livestock including farmers, saleyards and abattoirs.

Philip Halton, Executive Director of the Australian Livestock Transporters Association, says the new animal welfare and transport laws won't just apply to the owner and operator of the vehicle.
